Led by Hunger Free New Jersey, the New Jersey Food for Thought Campaign is driven by a statewide steering committee that includes the New Jersey Departments of Agriculture, Education and Health, anti-hunger and health groups, local governments, advocates and New Jersey's major education associations. The campaign's national partners are Food Research & Action Center and the American Dairy Association Northeast.

The campaign's goal is to end childhood hunger by expanding school and community participation in three federal key child nutrition programs: school breakfast, summer meals and afterschool meals. For more information, visit njfoodforthought.org.

Pandemic Amplifies Need for Summer Food

During the unplanned school closings due to the coronavirus, schools across New Jersey have stepped up to serve meals to tens of thousands of students.

This has been critical assistance for families who depend on subsidized school meals to feed their children when schools are open. It has been equally important for parents who found themselves suddenly unemployed during the COVID pandemic.

The ability to feed so many children outside of normal school hours has been accomplished, in part, due to the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) providing flexibility in how meals are served. In normal times, the federal child nutrition programs, especially the Summer Food Service Program (SFSP), have layers of rules that meal sponsors must meet to participate. The USDA administers the programs on the federal level.

During the pandemic, those rules have been relaxed. This has enabled school districts and other organizations to provide multiple meals at one time, allow parents to pick up food for their children and eliminated the need for meals to be served in group (congregate) settings.

The pandemic, then, has underscored two critical issues:

- More flexibility in federal child nutrition programs is needed to reach more children with this much-needed nutrition during “normal” times.
- Every summer, schools close for more than two months. While the need during the pandemic has been greater, the fact is that tens of thousands of New Jersey children face hunger each summer.

Yet, in summer 2019, New Jersey communities reached only about one-quarter of low-income children who receive free or reduced-price school lunch during the academic year. National standards recommend reaching 40 percent of these children.

While progress has been made in recent years, this is still a huge gap that leaves many families struggling each summer to put food on the table. Even during normal times, many families face increased summertime costs for child care, camp and other expenses, making it more difficult to provide adequate nutrition to their children.

Each year, Hunger Free New Jersey publishes a report tracking participation in federal summer meal programs and highlighting successful strategies. This report looks at participation in summer 2019 and innovative practices being used during the pandemic that could also be effective in summers to come.

At a Glance: Summer Meals Participation

	Average Daily Participation, July of Each Year	Meals Served, July Each Year	Participation rate as a percent of students receiving free/reduced price school lunch
2015	74,808	2,740,340	19

2017	94,803	3,173,617	24
2018	103,194	3,081,331	26
2019	101,381	3,191,937	26
Percent Change 15-19	36	16	37

Summer Meals Fill Nutritional Gap

In July 2019, nearly 3.2 million summer meals were served to children in communities across the state, according to the New Jersey Department of Agriculture, which administers the program on the state level. This includes schools, parks, playgrounds, libraries, community pools, housing authorities and other places where children typically congregate in the summer.

On an average day in July 2019, more than 101,000 children received a meal. While total child participation dipped slightly in 2019, this still represents a 36 percent increase since 2015. And despite the drop in the number of children served in 2019, communities served up more meals, suggesting that many are adding breakfast and supper to the menu.

The long-term growth of summer meal service has occurred through the Summer Food Service Program (SFSP), which allows schools, community organizations and local government to serve meals in a variety of settings, such as schools, parks and libraries. SFSP participation in New Jersey inched up only 1 percent from 2018 to 2019, but has grown 50 percent since 2015.

From 2015 to 2019, the number of New Jersey youth served through the National School Lunch Program (NSLP) has grown 9 percent, but has been on the decline in recent years. NSLP participation dipped 9 percent from 2018 to 2019. Meals served through this program are only available to children attending summer school or other programs offered through schools.

New Jersey school districts are increasingly serving meals through SFSP because this program provides greater flexibility in how and where meals are served and offers higher per-meal federal reimbursements.

New Jersey Claiming More Federal Funds

As a result of the long-term increase in the number of meals served, New Jersey communities are collecting millions more in federal funds to feed hungry children in the summer. In 2019, communities received $12.4 million in federal dollars — money New Jersey taxpayers have already sent to Washington D.C. — up an encouraging 67 percent since 2015, according to the USDA.

SFSP Sponsors, Sites Continue to Grow

The number of sponsors participating in the Summer Food Service Program has grown 25 percent since 2015, while the sites these sponsors serve has increased 29 percent. This means that meals are available in more communities.

Summer Meals 2020 Uncertain

In 2019, a new state law required school districts with at least half of students eligible for free or reduced-price meals to participate in the Summer Food Service Program.

Last summer, districts could request a waiver to the requirement so they could plan their programs. Most requested and were granted that waiver.

This summer, 128 districts are mandated to participate in SFSP. These are districts that have not previously participated. Of those, 28 have committed to becoming sponsors, which are responsible for managing all aspects of the program, according to the New Jersey Department of Agriculture. Ninety-seven indicated they would have schools become a meal site under an existing sponsor. Three had not committed to either as of the writing of this report.

With limitations on how camps and other programs can operate this summer, it is likely there will be fewer recreational opportunities for children, resulting in fewer meals served through these traditional sites. It also appears likely that many communities will continue to provide meals as they did during the unplanned closings. This includes distributing food at schools and other community sites and delivering meals directly to families using buses or other mobile delivery methods.

In fact, the USDA in May extended flexibilities in three key areas through Aug. 31. This includes:

- Allowing meals to be served outside of group settings. Meals can be distributed at a site where families pick up the meals, as well as be delivered to children's homes,
- Providing flexibility as to when meals are served,
- Allowing parents and guardians to pick up meals for children.

As people continue to struggle with the uncertainties brought on by the pandemic, it is critical that New Jersey communities continue to strengthen the food safety net for children and families. Summer food service is a critical piece to that puzzle.

Summer Meals Combat Childhood Hunger

Without free- or reduced-priced school meals, children often face hunger during the summer, especially those who rely on school meals during the academic year. Many New Jersey food pantries report that more families turn to them for food in the summer months to replace the meals provided by schools.

To fight summer hunger, the United States Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service provides funding to local governments, school districts and community organizations to serve summer meals to children through the Summer Food Service Program.

School districts can also opt to participate in the National School Lunch Academic Summer Program. Under this program, districts only feed children who are enrolled in summer academic or enrichment programs. Per-meal reimbursements are lower for this program than for SFSP.

At SFSP sites that are open to the public, parents typically are not required to fill out an application, pre-enroll their children, nor provide identification for their children to receive meals, under federal rules. Children can simply show up at an open site and receive a meal, which must meet federal nutrition standards, including being low-fat, low-sugar and whole-grain foods.

In addition to providing free, healthy meals, in normal times, these programs also offer an opportunity for children 18 years and younger to play together, engage in enrichment activities, hone their academic skills and be better prepared when they return to school in September.

Pandemic Innovations Serve as Lessons in Partnerships

During the unplanned school closings, school districts and community partners teamed up to meet the daunting challenge of providing food to hundreds of thousands of children who were learning from home. Here is a look at a few examples of this innovation, which can also help communities reach more children in need during normal times.

Paterson: “Stronger Together”

When schools first closed in March, the Paterson School District was wary of allowing children into the schools, until the buildings could be thoroughly cleaned. So, school officials teamed up with the Paterson Fire Department to set up outdoor food distribution sites at all seven of the city’s firehouses.

Next, Paterson school officials reached out to houses of worship, many of which also agreed to serve as distribution sites, according to David Buchholtz, the district’s food services executive director.

“We had about 14 locations and that was good at first,” he said.

Then, all the district’s drivers had to be quarantined, leaving no way to deliver food to the sites.

Enter CUMAC, a non-profit organization dedicated to feeding people and changing lives.

“CUMAC was gracious enough to lend us their trucks and two of their drivers to help out during the three weeks my drivers were quarantined,” Buchholtz said.

Logistical issues eventually prompted the district to move the distribution sites back to the schools. But, those community partnerships were invaluable during the first few weeks of the school closings.

“When the pandemic hit, we knew we would be there for Paterson in whatever way we were needed,” said CUMAC Executive Director Mark Dinglasan. “When I heard about Paterson’s predicament, I spoke to Dave and we worked out a schedule. My trucks and drivers were basically part of Dave’s team.

“I hope this leads to more partnerships during normal times,” Dinglasan added. “We’re so much stronger together.”

Camden City School District’s food truck is just one way the district is feeding children during the pandemic and beyond.

Camden Pairs Pop-up Pantries with Meal for Kids

The Camden City School District is pairing meals for students with pop-up pantries for the adults in the household to meet the nutritional needs of the entire family.

In addition to the district’s service of three meals and a snack to students for every day of the week, the district is also providing food for the entire family through a partnership with the Food Bank of South Jersey.

“Not only are we feeding our students, we also have the opportunity to send food home for the adults,” said Arlethia Brown, senior manager school nutrition. “We are giving them a bigger bang for the buck. As a result, the number of children we’re feeding has increased tremendously.”

During the unplanned closures, the district has been providing three days worth of meals on Monday and four days worth on Thursdays at 10 sites throughout the city.

“We have our pickup tables outside,” Brown explained. “Parents identify their student and the team gets the food for both the children and parents. It’s a win-win for everyone.”

The district has been promoting this assistance through its website, robo calls and by getting the information out through the city and community organizations.

Brown hopes to continue this partnership even after the pandemic ends.

“We would love to continue with this operation and open additional sites,” she said. “We will definitely be working with the food bank and any other organization that can support the summer meals program. This is absolutely the way to go.”

Hamilton Cares: A Coordinated Community Approach to Hunger

It started as neighbors helping neighbors.

Now it has grown into a coordinated, community-wide effort that is delivering food to children, families and seniors during the pandemic — and promises to continue even after the crisis is over.

“This whole process began because I knew families in the community who were in need,” said Amy Hassa, a parent and school board member in Hamilton Township, Atlantic County. “When I picked up meals for my kids at school, I would pick up meals for other families.”

Hassa then put a call out on Facebook, asking people if they needed help or if they wanted to help those in need. And she realized the need was severe.

So Hassa contacted all the community partners she could think of — the school district, the food pantry, local government, the police department, businesses and other community organizations.

And the community responded. The organizations formed a new coalition called Hamilton Cares, which is now coordinating food delivery throughout the Hamilton-Mays Landing community.

“I don’t think people really understood the need until this happened,” said Kimberly D’Angelo, food coordinator, Main Street Pantry/NJ Salvation Army Unit, Mays Landing. “We had never worked with the school district or the police department before. This has been an eye-opening experience.”

Through its partnership with the Community Food Bank of New Jersey, Southern Branch, the food pantry is providing food boxes to parents through the schools and through mobile delivery. The police department is sending out alerts to inform residents that meals are available for both children and parents.

The school district has established a hotline that any area resident can call for assistance. If the person calling has a child in the district and is unable to travel to a distribution site to pick up meals, district staff will deliver the food. If they do not have children, they will be directed to Hassa and others who can connect them with the help they need.

The Main Street Food Pantry is working with the Hamilton School District and other community partners to reach more families in this time of need.

Local restaurants are also donating meals, which are being delivered along with food boxes to children and senior citizens alike. Volunteers from various organizations are stepping up to help distribute and deliver the food.

“We are doing everything we can to show high-risk individuals that we are here for them,” Hassa said.

D’Angelo expects these partnerships to continue far beyond the end of the pandemic, highlighting the fact that the most effective summer meal and other feeding programs are founded on community partnerships.

“The silver lining is the creation of these new partnerships and the recognition that we can all play a role in feeding our community,” D’Angelo said. “Everyone is stepping up and that will continue beyond this current crisis.”

Sponsor-Level Data

The following chart shows sponsor-level data and the communities that each sponsor served in both 2018 and 2019. Data is currently collected only by sponsor, not by community. Since some sponsors serve multiple communities, it is not possible to show participation on the municipal level. However, beginning this summer, community-level data is expected to be available.
